FISH IN THE ANTARCTIC.

German Expedition Will Make Special Search for Fisheries.

The results of the expeditions that will start for the antarctic regions next summer will probably be chiefly scientific, says the New York Sun. It is hoped that the magnetic and meteorological observations may prove of practical value to vessels that skirt the edge of those regions, but other practical results are scarcely expected. The antarctic lands are believed by many polar students to be even less extensive than has been commonly supposed, and all the year round they are so deeply mantled under snow and ice that the prospects are very slim for the discovery of valuable sources of minerals. The penguins, seals and whales are the only animals of importance, but penguin skins are of too little value to be worth transporting so far, while all the whaling and sealing enterprises of recent years have not paid expenses. None of the useful varieties of fish is yet known to exist in antarctic waters, and the southern boundary of the fishing regions now lies along the sailing routes between Cape Town, St. Paul island, Tasmania, New Zealand and Magellan straits.

It is thought, however, that useful fish may exist in antarctic water, and the German south polar expedition intends to investigate this possibility. The idea that these waters may be found to be an important addition to the fishing grounds of the world is thought to be all the more plausible because Norwegian and Danish fishermen, with improved apparatus for carrying on their industry, have found that fishing pays in many of the Norwegian fiords which were formerly thought to be worthless.

The Germans intend, therefore, in the coming expedition, to make a very careful investigation of life in the sea depths over a wide area of antarctic waters. They will carry a large variety of nets and other apparatus adapted for investigations at any desired depth. It is known that their headquarters are to be Kerguelen island. If they find plenty of edible fish in the neighborhood of this island the discovery will be particularly valuable. In view of the efforts now making to colonize the island and make it useful for sheep raising.
